

Picture-Perfect

Gajate specializes in photojournalistic wedding photography. He says the younger generations favor the storytelling pictorial method. He recommends choosing the photographer you most click with as a sure-fire way to minimize wedding-day photo disasters.

When it comes to prints, for his part, Gajate sees more black-and-white photography as the chosen medium by couples. Some couples even like sepia tones in images. Gajate believes this trend has to do with a return to retro-looking art and photography.

Meanwhile, Fort Lauderdale-based wedding photographer Corey McFarlane says that when he offers candid photography as an option, some folks still look at him like he has "four heads." The initial negative reactions are based on a fear of the unknown. That's because older relatives point out that, when they tied the knot, all their pictures were posed.

When weighing the pros and cons, McFarlane agrees that the photojournalistic style can be a risk because the images may not be exactly as the couple wants them, since they are not posed. Still, he says that photojournalistic documenting, rather than just recording, makes for lively pictures.
